Foreword

Ms. Annette Amerman, Historical Inquiries & Research Branch with History Division, has performed an important service in creating a research tool and database for scholars interested in amphibious warfare and its connection to the United States Marine Corps. It is no coincidence that the survey begins with Marine Corps landings that took place from 1935 to 2015. In fact, after several years of work by senior officers and students at Marine Corps Schools, Quantico, Virginia, the Commandant of the Marine Corps, Major General Ben H. Fuller signed off on the Tentative Manual for Landing Operations (1934). This pathbreaking publication became the blueprint for Marine Corps landing operations (both big and small) that took place during World War II and for years afterward. Moreover, the Tentative Man- ual, along with the Small Wars Manual (1940) and General Alfred M. Gray's Warfighting, FMFM-1 (1989) arguably rank as the three most important doctrinal publications ever produced by the Marine Corps.

The Marines Have Landed represents a unique research tool, but it is not intended to be comprehensive. Rather than rehash the larger and more well-known landing operations that took place during major conflicts, such as World War II or Korea, this particular database will enable students of warfare to understand the large volume of lesser-known landing operations that are no less important for understanding the institutional history of the Marine Corps. Most people will come away amazed at just how frequently over the years the Navy/Marine Corps team has been tasked to perform these highly complex operations. It is our hope that this research tool will be given heavy use by the faculty and students at Marine Corps University. I predict it will become a valuable historical resource for years to come.

Preface

In 1974, the U.S. Marine Corps' History and Museums Division reprinted Captain Harry A. Ellsworth's One Hundred and Eighty Landings of United States Marines, 1800-1934; a publication still widely used today, although woefully in need of a subsequent volume. Ellsworth's volume focused on the four basic reasons for landings: (1) political intervention; (2) punitive actions; (3) protection of diplomatic mission, nationals, and their property; and (4) humanitarian aid. Very little has changed in the 80 years since Ellsworth left off; for example, Marines may not conduct punitive actions but "show of force" operations are often used as deterrents against belligerent governments.

In this volume, the landings are identified as: (1) noncombatant evacuations, (2) humanitarian/disaster relief operations, and (3) peacekeeping/stability operations, all of which involve Marines making landfall from either aircraft or ships. Additionally, major combat operations—World War II, Korea, Vietnam, Desert Shield/Storm, Iraq, and Afghanistan—are omitted from this work as the topics are voluminous enough to warrant a volume of their own at a future time.

This edition, unlike Ellsworth's original, is presented in chronological order and provides limited information on each operation in foreign lands. If no landing took place during a period, the year is left blank. The information herein was assembled from official records, such as command chronologies and working papers of various Headquarters Marine Corps agencies, Department of Defense and Marine Corps news releases, and the working files of the Historical Inquiries and Research Branch (formerly the Historical Reference Branch) of History Division (formerly History and Museums Division). The information presented includes the date, location, mission type, units involved, and a short synopsis of the mission.

From 1935 to 1946, excluding World War II, the landings were often conducted by Marines that formed detachments from a ship's complement or that were part of a legation guard already stationed nearby. After World War II, the Marine Corps began "floating" a battalion landing team (BLT) on Navy ships, establishing a floating forward-deployed unit ready to make such landings. In the summer of 1946, Lieutenant General Roy S. Geiger witnessed the atomic blast tests under the cognizance of Operation Crossroads at Bikini Atoll in the Pacific Ocean. Three weeks later, General Geiger wrote the Commandant, General Archibald A. Vandegrift, with his impressions from the blasts and the lasting effects on Marine Corps doctrine, stating that ". . . I cannot visualize another landing such as was executed at Normandy or Okinawa."<sup>1</sup> Geiger's letter sparked a flurry of planning boards and studies instituted by the Commandant of the Marine Corps (CMC) to review force structure, equipment, and amphibious doctrine in response to the atomic weapon. The outgrowth of these boards and studies was that the helicopter became the tool, vertical envelopment became the doctrine, and the Marine air-ground task force (MAGTF) became the force structure needed to take the Corps into the atomic future.

In 1953, the 1st Provisional MAGTF was activated in Marine Corps Base Kaneohe Bay, Hawaii. While the first official MAGTF had the four basic elements—command, air combat, ground combat, and combat service support—the varying sizes had not yet been established. However, by 1962, the MAGTF concept was codified to the three scalable levels we know today: the Marine expeditionary force (MEF), Marine expeditionary brigade (MEB), and Marine expeditionary unit (MEU).<sup>2</sup> The forward-deployed MEU, an outgrowth of the original “floating battalion” has been the proven workhorse of Marine Corps landing operations since their first use in the early 1960s. The combination of the battalion landing team (BLT), a reinforced helicopter squadron, and an integrated logistics unit is quite effective in assisting American citizens evacuate from hot-spots or providing humanitarian relief to victims of natural disasters.

The MEB, while not as heavily used as the MEU in the same period, has participated when large-scale natural disasters occurred, such as typhoons striking multiple countries over great distances as seen in the Philippines in December 2012. Understanding this shift in doctrine, technology, and force structure within the Corps is essential to understanding why such landings and quick reaction military responses to unstable natural and political situations have typically fallen to the Marine Corps during the past 80 years.

Further, the information from Ellsworth's original publication has served as a useful tool for historians and analysts. This updated listing is intended to provide the same purpose for historians, force structure analysts, and policy wonks. Figure 1 represents an example of the data that can be mined from this work. The statistical illustration answers the question: "How many operations (excluding Desert Shield/Storm) did the Marine Corps participate in during the 1990s when the end strength of the Corps was dramatically reduced?" The chart clearly shows that, despite the reduction, the operational tempo increased.

Lastly, not all Marine operations warrant a lengthy narrative history or detailed analysis. Therefore, this compilation of the smaller landings and the more well-known operations serves as a starting point for possible larger works and as another method of presenting the history of the Corps over an extended period.

Operation Eastern Exit

The 4th MEB, including BLT 1/2, HMMs 263 and 365, and a detachment from HMH-461, evacuated 260 U.S. and foreign citizens from the American embassy in Mogadishu, Somalia, as armed militants clashed with government forces.

DATE: April–July 1991
LOCATION: Turkey/Northern Iraq
MISSION: Humanitarian Assistance

Operation Provide Comfort

In response to Kurdish refugees fleeing Iraq, the 24th MEU, including BLT 2/8 and HMM-264, established refugee camps and provided food and security across Turkey.

DATE: May–June 1991
LOCATION: Bangladesh
MISSION: Disaster Relief

Operation Sea Angel

The 5th MEB, consisting of RLT 5 (BLTs 2/5 and 3/5) and MAG-50 (HMM-265 and HMLA-169), provided tons of relief supplies following Cyclone Marian, which destroyed 80–90 percent of the structures in the coastal region of the country and killed more than 140,000 people.

DATE: June 1991
LOCATION: Philippines
MISSION: Disaster Relief

Operation Fiery Vigil

In response to the eruption of Mount Pinatubo, MAGTF 4-90 (already in the Philippines) and 15th MEU, consisting of BLT 1/9 and HMM-163, performed security augmentation, heavy equipment support, cleanup, medical, and food resupply and evacuated more than 21,000 U.S. troops and dependants in the wake of the largest eruption to impact a densely populated area.

1992

DATE: April 1992
LOCATION: Italy
MISSION: Disaster Relief

Operation Hot Rock

Helicopters from 24th MEU's HMM-266 carried

200,000 pounds of concrete slabs, each weighing 14,000 pounds, to alter the course of volcanic lava from Mount Etna on the island of Sicily.

DATE: June 1992–March 1996
LOCATION: Adriatic Sea, Balkans
MISSION: Security Operation

Operation Sharp Guard

This joint naval blockade was established to enforce UN economic sanctions against Serbia-Montenegro and the arms embargo, which was suspended after both sets of sanctions were terminated. Multiple MEUs were deployed to the area throughout the time period.

DATE: August 1992–February 1993
LOCATION: Somalia
MISSION: Humanitarian Assistance

Joint Task Force Provide Relief

A detachment of Marines from I Marine Expeditionary Force (I MEF) airlifted food and other supplies to the drought stricken areas of Somalia.
