Supporting the goals and ideals of “National Passport Month”.

Whereas through international travel, people of the United States can individually play a major role towards improving foreign relations by building bridges and making connections with citizens of other countries;

Whereas interacting with the global community inspires United States citizens to reflect on the diverse multi-cultural background that has defined the Nation as a great country of cooperation and progress;

Whereas having a passport and traveling abroad creates connections and promotes understanding with the global community, supporting goodwill throughout the world, and opening the doors to increased peace, tolerance, and acceptance;

Whereas having a passport and traveling abroad opens up a preponderance of educational opportunities and experiences for people in the United States of all ages;

Whereas having a passport and traveling abroad enables United States citizens to see first-hand the effect of the Nation on the world, including the tremendous amount of humanitarian aid given by the United States through both public and private sectors;

Whereas having a passport and traveling abroad reminds people in the United States that they are members of a global family and gives them opportunities to mend rifts around the world;

Whereas it is estimated that fewer than 30 percent of eligible people in the United States have passports, thereby limiting their ability to travel outside the United States;

Whereas in 2008, and again in 2009, the number of passports issued to people of the United States dropped significantly, and in 2010 the number of passports issued to people of the United States showed only a slight increase over the number issued in 2009, indicating a need for renewed focus on obtaining passports;

Whereas in 2010, the number of trips outside of the United States made by United States citizens dropped by 11 percent from 2009;

Whereas the Western Hemisphere Travel Initiative has created new requirements for citizens traveling by land or sea from Canada, Mexico, Bermuda, and the Caribbean;

Whereas the Department of State introduced the Passport Card to provide a new method of identification for citizens traveling by land or sea from Canada, Mexico, Bermuda, and the Caribbean;

Whereas the more United States citizens travel abroad, the more they will experience opportunities to increase their understanding of the world and the role the United States plays in it;

Whereas the creation and support of a “National Passport Month” signals to people in the United States the important role they can play as ambassadors for the Nation by serving as agents of understanding, tolerance, and mutual respect; and
