Freedom to Vote Act Constitutional Authority Statement

The Freedom to Vote Act relies upon many separate bases of constitutional authority, each of which vests in Congress the power to enact pro-democracy legislation. First, Congress has broad authority to regulate the time, place, and manner of congressional elections under the Elections Clause of the Constitution, article I, section 4, clause 1. Second, Congress has both the authority and responsibility, as the legislative body for the United States, to fulfill the promise of article IV, section 4, of the Constitution, which guarantees to every state a republican form of government. Third, Congress has broad authority pursuant to section 5 of the Fourteenth Amendment to enforce the provisions of the Fourteenth Amendment, including its protections of the right to vote and the democratic process. Fourth, Congress has authority pursuant section 2 of the Fifteenth Amendment, which explicitly bars denial or abridgment of the right to vote on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude. Finally, Congress has the power to protect the right to vote from denial or abridgment on account of sex, age, or ability to pay a poll tax or other tax pursuant to the Nineteenth, Twenty-Fourth, and Twenty-Sixth Amendments.
